Writing

Everyone in their life at least once seen a person that is just better at some things than others. They may have some talent but they would not find good use for it if they don't work hard enough to achieve their goals.

I agree with author's point of view. Experience in certain activities provide more use than a simple talent. Many physical activities require muscle memory and good reaction time, which are obtainable through big amount of practice. Activities related to mind also need experience to perform better. For example, in strategy games after every loss and mistake that we learn from will result in better outcome.

For another example, Mozart, one of the greatest pianists, used to practice playing piano even at night when his father were him up even when he was a little child. Mozart not only had talent but also dedication and love for what he is doing.

All these ~~reason~~ play a big role in his success.

In conclusion, any amount of talent without practice and hard work will not result in success. Most activities need experience to learn from past mistakes and perform better next time. Hard work and dedication mixed with talent is ~~an~~ a recipe to success
